

To think philosophically about research is crucial to good research. The seminar will explain what this means, drawing from a tradition of conceptual analysis so well illustrated by Socrates. But that analysis (the Socratic dialogue) takes us soon into deeper issues to do with the aims of education and thus with ethics, with the nature of knowledge and thus with the organisation of the curriculum, with social philosophy and thus with the relation of persons to the wider social community.